Flat-panel display devices provide displays, such as televisions, that are thinner, lighter, and more flexible than conventional cathode ray tubes. Because of their low weight and thin profile, flat-panel displays can be used in new applications and are desirable in applications where bulk and weight are critical. The ability to view flat-panel displays in bright sunlight is one of the top complaints of the consumers of flat-panel displays. This is because the flat-panel displays do not have an inherent protection against glare, and are therefore easily viewable in bright sunlight. For example, plasma display panels require a fair amount of power (about 1-2 watts), and even with active matrix technology, flat-panel displays can require as much as 60 watts to display video. Efforts have been made to provide non-reflective, glare-free flat-panel displays. One such attempt is disclosed in Patent Cooperation Treaty Published Application WO 01/57509, which discloses a thin-film transistor liquid crystal display (TFT-LCD) using an antireflective film. The antireflective film consists of micrometer sized particles embedded in a transparent resin. When applied as a thin film on an LCD substrate, 3da54e8ca3
