I'm trying to create a class to handle circular dependency resolution. I've got a pointer to the base class, which has a unique identifier. The base class has a virtual method called GetIdentifier, which returns a unique identifier. I've got a class that stores a pointer to the base class. How do I define a typedef in a template class such that the base class will be polymorphic when I call the GetIdentifier method? A: Your class has to have a templated member with the same name as the class itself. class MyClass { public: template T* pointer; }; And this is how you use it: MyClass myClass; // Use it myClass.pointer->GetIdentifier(); Edit: It is worth noting that using a template is only a way to solve your problem, it does not change the fact that you have a problem. Whether you have a pointer or a reference to a class, the class will have a data member with the same name as the class, there is no way around this. If you want the method to return a unique identifier, rather than a pointer to a unique identifier, you have to rethink the solution. In the case of MyClass, you might want to rethink the design a bit. A: You can't. Typedefs act on types, not classes. But maybe you don't actually need to resort to template-specialization or typedefs. If the "real" identifier is only ever a subset of what the "general" identifier is, then you can use a base class to do what you are doing. } 1cb139a0ed
