Next week, South Korean lawmakers will hold hearings to vote on the criminal impeachment of President

Park Geun-hye. If they vote to impeach her, the Constitutional Court will then make the final call on whether to uphold or overturn that impeachment. It seems increasingly likely that the court will uphold her ouster. Here are five reasons why. First, even if the Constitutional Court defies conventional wisdom and throws out the impeachment, Park can stay in office as long as she has not yet completed a four-year term. In 2016, the Constitutional Court ruled that the previous impeachment against then-President Roh Moo-hyun was invalid because it had failed to meet the Constitution's requirements for impeaching a president. However, that ruling hasn't changed the Constitution or set any strict limits on the president's tenure. The Constitution simply says that the president can be impeached, and that the president can remain in office even if he or she is impeached. When Park's impeachment first arose in March, a group of liberal scholars and activists argued that Roh's impeachment should have been upheld in 2006 by the Constitutional Court because it failed to meet the requirements for impeaching a president. The court, which is made up of around nine conservative and nine liberal justices, did not find this argument persuasive. And in any case, they say the same arguments that persuaded them to throw out Roh's impeachment still apply to Park, as a lame-duck president. Second, the Constitutional Court tends to defer to political will within the legislative branch. The court has not overturned a single presidential impeachment since it was established in 1982. When such a decision is appealed to the high court, it has been overturned just once in the past three decades. The impeachment procedure, of course, is political in nature. The Constitutional Court's take on Park's impeachment will have no bearing on the outcome of the upcoming election. Third, the Constitutional Court is conservative and does not like to interfere with political processes
